Relevant results: Results show two radically different patterns of religious change. The fall in religious practice in Spain observed throughout the first 16 years after the political transition was due mostly to the inter-cohort change that affects each new generation born after 1950. In the case of Poland, post-transition change is less marked and due mainly to decline in religious practice on the individual level. The study also observes that the cohorts of Poles born during and after the fall of communism are significantly less religious than older cohorts.

Applicant's contribution: Analysis the extent to which the evolution of religiosity in Spain and Poland in their post-democratic transition periods has been affected by the process of generational replacement. For Spain data are drawn from several surveys carried out by the Spanish Centre for Sociological Studies (CIS) between 1980 and 1996. For Poland the data come from the Polish General Social Survey and ISSP covering 1992–2008.

Applicant's contribution: (1) Preparation of the detailed mapping the conditions of entry and stay and the post-entry restrictions and entitlements currently in force for family migrants by consulting the relevant body of national legislation. Namely: (a) Identifying TCN family migrants: Who has the legal status of family migrant? Who is allowed to sponsor TCN nationals? How are family ties defined? Are there differences in restrictions applied to TCN on the basis of nationality? (b) Identifying conditions of entry and residence for TCN family migrants: What are the conditions of entry and stay for family migrants? What are the implications of dependence on the sponsor for the access to resources or to citizenship? (c) Identifying entitlements or restrictions to access resources: What are the entitlements and restrictions of TCN family migrants in the areas of employment, education, health, social housing, welfare benefits and civic participation? (2) Empirical analysis of available statistical data sources in order to explore and describe the integration of the family migrants in the specific context defined by legal and institutional context of each country.
